Not illustrated. 1915 Excerpt: . sinus probe from the point in question up into the frontal sinus, when practicable, would be a valuable diagnostic measure. This, too, is by no means always possible as every rhinologist has discovered. Transillumination is very disappointing in this condition, and can only be of value if the sinus is filled with pus, and then from comparison of the two sides. Valuable information may be furnished by the X-ray, which in doubtful cases, may serve to clinch the diagnosis. Given a person lately the subject of an attack of acute rhinitis, in whom the subjective and objective symptoms are of the type sketched under this discussion of the two forms of the disease just treated of, and one may feel well assured that he is dealing with a case of acute frontal sinusitis, either of the catarrhal or purulent form. Generally the differentiation between these...
