Not illustrated. 1885 Excerpt: .go elsewhere; that a faith so firmly fixed would not move. Wait a little, Hassan says; he will take the four Napoleons, and would take three if we had offered them. So the debate goes on in fury, the anger increasing, until Hassan says four Napoleons will buy the feathers. We pay the money and go to the boat with our plumes. When we thank Hassan for his services, he intimates that if we had let him alone, he would have bought them for two Napoleons. It was very warm when we gathered under the trees to make ready for our journey. Sami Bey had hurried us, and the General was, as he always is, the first at his post. The Governor was there, and there was a suspicion, his clothes looked so neat and without wrinkles, that he had sat up all night to keep them nice. He brought the General a despatch from Gordon Pacha, the famous English officer who has been made Governor-General of the Provinces of the Equator by the Khedive, and who is now at Khartoum. But we are just within his provinces, and he sends his message of welcome, one great soldier greeting another. The General returns his thanks and we mount. The General is in luck this morning. The Governor has provided him with an Arabian steed--one of the animals about which poets write. This horse was worthy of a poem, and the General expresses his admiration at its...
